

Sema-more by Wil Z. (Chicago)

The problem with communication is sometimes you aren't being as clear as you wish. Two people might be saying different things, but somehow they are able to direct themselves to the same message. In the end, you will see what form of nautical communication I really wanted to form puzzles around.

A word that can be split down the middle to form two equal sized words.

A word that contains an abbreviation for a day of the week.

A word that contains a three-letter set (trigram) from another word.

A word where one letter can be replaced with C to make a new word.

A word whose final six letters is also a word.

A word that contains a two-character roman numeral less than 500.

A word containing a three-letter word, contiguously, for an appendage.

A word that shares exactly 5 unique letters with another word.

A word where one letter can be replaced with CH to make a new word.
